Childhood

Your earliest memories

My earliest memory is a vivid one - I recall knocking over a vase in our living room, and my mother's upset voice still echoes in my mind like thunder. I didn't understand what she was saying at the time, but the sound of her voice has stayed with me. The vase was sitting on an old spinning wheel, one of those antique things that had been converted into a planter. I'm not entirely sure what its original purpose was - maybe it was used for sewing or spinning cotton into thread - but it was an old, sturdy piece of furniture that had been repurposed to hold flowers.

As I close my eyes, I can still see the vase falling, and the room that followed is etched in my memory. The living room was a warm and cozy space, filled with the familiar smells and sounds of home. After the vase fell, there were water and flowers everywhere, and my mom's initial shock gave way to a mixture of frustration and concern. I remember the feeling of being scared and not understanding what was happening, but the details of my mom's reaction after the initial shock are a bit fuzzy. What remains is the image of the broken vase, the old spinning wheel, and the sound of my mother's voice, loud and unsettling, like thunder on a stormy day.
